SOUTHERN DIVISION

JILL STEIN, et al.,

Plaintiffs,

Case No. 16-14233

Hon. Mark A. Goldsmith

vs.

CHRISTOPHER M. THOMAS,
et al.,

Defendants.

ORDER DISSOLVING TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDER (Dkt. 16)

On December 5, 2016, this Court entered a temporary restraining order (“TRO”) requiring Defendants “to cease any delay in the commencement of the recount of the presidential vote cast in Michigan” and to “continue [the recount] until further order of this Court.” 12/5/2016 Op. & Order at 7 (Dkt. 16). Defendants appealed that order to the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit (Dkts. 22, 25).

On December 6, 2016, the U.S. Court of Appeals affirmed this Court’s grant of the TRO, holding that it was not an abuse of discretion to “halt[] operation of the waiting period law,” Mich. Comp. Laws § 168.882(3).¹ See Stein v. Thomas, 12/6/2016 Order at 8, Case No. 16-2690 (6th Cir. Dec. 6, 2016). The majority further stated that “[i]f, subsequently, the Michigan courts determine that Plaintiffs’ recount is improper under Michigan state law for any reason, we expect the district court to entertain any properly filed motions to dissolve or modify its order in this case.” Id.

Shortly after the Sixth Circuit issued its order, the Michigan Court of Appeals held that the recount of the votes case in the presidential election should never have been initiated in the first place, because Stein was not an “aggrieved candidate” as required to initiate a recount under Mich. Comp. Laws § 168.879. See generally Attorney Gen. v. Bd. of State Canvassers, 12/6/2016 Op. & Order, Case Nos. 335947 & 335958 (Mich. Ct. App. Dec. 6, 2016). The Michigan court found that the statute accorded “aggrieved” status only to a candidate who could state in good faith that “but for mistake or fraud, the candidate would have had a reasonable chance of winning the election” – a standard the Michigan court said the recount petitioner could not satisfy. Id. at 5. Shortly after that ruling, Michigan Attorney General Bill Schuette, the Michigan Republican Party, and the original Defendants each filed in this Court emergency motions to dissolve the TRO (Dkts. 26, 28, 29). This Court immediately entered an order for a hearing on the motions, which was conducted earlier today.

All agree that the initial justification for the TRO — i.e., Plaintiffs’ challenge to the two-day rule — is no longer at issue. Recognizing this fact, Plaintiffs filed an amended complaint (Dkt. 30) before filing their response to Defendants’ motions to dissolve the TRO (Dkt. 33), broadening their claims in this case. Based on the assertion that there may have been fraud or other mistakes in the recordation of the votes, they now assert that any act by Defendants that “jeopardizes completion” of a recount amounts to maintaining a system of voting that denies Michigan voters the right to have their votes counted, in violation of their rights under the equal protection clause, the due process clause, and the First Amendment.

In tandem with their new claims, Plaintiffs’ response to the motions to dissolve argues that the TRO should be preserved on either of two alternative bases: (i) that the Michigan Court of Appeals’ ruling on the “aggrieved party” issue represents a “distorted interpretation of the text” of Mich. Comp. Laws § 168.879, see Pls. Resp. at 3-4; and (ii) that Plaintiffs have a federal constitutional right to a recount independent of the state statutory scheme providing for a recount, see id. at 10. The Court finds neither argument persuasive.²

Plaintiffs argue that the Michigan Court of Appeals abrogated the authority of the Michigan Legislature by interpreting the term “aggrieved” incorrectly. Id. at 2-3. Recognizing that federal courts typically avoid overruling a state court’s interpretation of state law, Plaintiffs invoke precedents from the momentous litigation surrounding the 2000 presidential election, in which the Supreme Court addressed when such traditional deference need not be accorded. Plaintiffs’ theory is that those cases establish an allowance for federal courts to ignore certain state court pronouncements on state election laws concerning presidential elections in certain circumstances. However, Plaintiffs overstate the impact of these precedents and, in any case, ignore crucial differences between those cases and ours.

² As to the first issue, Intervenor Schuette argues that the law of the case doctrine requires this Court to simply accept the decision of the Michigan Court of Appeals without further analysis, on the theory that the Sixth Circuit has already decided that any ruling from the Michigan courts would be dispositive on Michigan law. However, in the present circumstances, the application of the law of the case doctrine is less than clear. It comes into play with respect to issues “previously determined” by a higher court. Bowling v. Pfizer, Inc., 132 F.3d 1147 (6th Cir. 1998). Here, the Sixth Circuit’s decision did not require an answer to whether a forthcoming Michigan court ruling would have to be accepted without further analysis; nor was the Sixth Circuit presented with the arguments Plaintiffs have made in response to the motions to dissolve the TRO. Further, it did not specifically direct this Court to accept any ruling by a Michigan court without further analysis. Instead, it directed this Court to “entertain” any motion to dissolve the TRO should there be a Michigan court ruling denying a right to a recount. This Court has done precisely that. Because the applicability of the doctrine is less than certain, this Court proceeds to consider Plaintiffs’ arguments on the merits.

In Bush v. Palm Beach County Canvassing Board, 531 U.S. 70 (2000) (Bush I), a Florida election official had declined to waive the statutory deadline for submitting recount returns, but the Florida Supreme Court nevertheless extended the deadline by 12 days. In reviewing the Florida Supreme Court's decision, which had interpreted Florida election laws, the Supreme Court expressed its apprehension that, in interpreting the election laws enacted by the Florida Legislature, the Florida Supreme Court had concluded that its legislature potentially was "circumscribe[d]" by the state constitution. Id. at 78. The U.S. Supreme Court recognized that Article II, § 1 grants the authority to select electors directly to the state legislatures, id. at 76-77, notwithstanding any limitations on that authority purporting to flow from another source of law, such as the state constitution. Accordingly, it remanded to the Florida Supreme Court for clarification of the basis of the ruling. Importantly, however, Bush I did not purport to overrule a state court ruling – rather, it sought clarification whether the state court had viewed itself constrained by its state constitution to the extent that its organic law was at variance with the legislative intent as evidenced by the statute itself. See Bush I, 531 U.S. at 77-78.

In Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98, 101 (2000) (Bush II), the Supreme Court concluded (under a variety of theories endorsed by different Justices) that continuation of the Florida recount could not be conducted consistent with the U.S. Constitution in sufficient time to take advantage of the "safe harbor" provision in 3 U.S.C. § 5. In a concurrence to the per curiam opinion in Bush II, Chief Justice Rehnquist, joined by Justices Thomas and Scalia, elaborated further, stating that, with respect to statutes enacted pursuant to Article II, § 1's grant of authority, the general coherence of the legislative scheme may not be altered by judicial interpretation so as to wholly change the statutorily provided apportionment of responsibility among these various bodies. In any election but a Presidential election, the Florida Supreme Court can give as little or as much deference to Florida's executives as it chooses, so far as Article II is concerned, and this Court will have no cause to question the court's actions. But, with respect to a Presidential election, the court must be both mindful of the legislature's role under Article II in choosing the manner of appointing electors and deferential to those bodies expressly empowered by the legislature to carry out its constitutional mandate.

Id. at 114 (Rehnquist, C.J., concurring).

The theory of the concurrence — a federal judicial override of state court determinations of state election laws in presidential elections — was not endorsed by a majority of the court. Indeed, it sparked disagreement by Justice Stevens (joined by Justices Ginsberg and Breyer). Id. at 124 (“Neither [3 U.S.C.] § 5 nor Article II grants federal judges any special authority to substitute their views for those of the state judiciary on matters of state law.”). Thus, it is unclear to what extent a federal court may utilize the less deferential approach that may be located in some of the Bush opinions.

Whatever may be the vitality of the doctrine that Plaintiffs invoke, it has no application here. The Michigan Court of Appeals' interpretation of its election laws does not alter “the general coherence” of the legislative recount scheme enacted in Mich. Comp. Laws § 168.879. It is at least arguable that the Michigan Legislature intended to confine costly and disruptive recounts to cases where a losing candidate stood a reasonable chance of changing the outcome of the election. That is certainly the typical petitioner for a recount, and nothing has been placed in the record to suggest that the Legislature may have had in mind a petitioner simply wishing to confirm the voting results, notwithstanding the absence of any reasonable likelihood of changing the result. Further, the Michigan court utilized traditional tools of analysis to reach that result, pointing to dictionaries and precedents in other contexts where the “aggrieved” concept is utilized in Michigan law. Plaintiffs offer cogent reasons to challenge the Michigan court's conclusions, but none leads to the conclusion that the Michigan court disregarded or plainly misread the legislature's intent.

This is a far cry from the Bush litigation. In Bush I, the Florida Supreme Court invoked its "equitable powers" to override an express 7-day deadline found in the statute and extend it by 12 days. See Bush I, 531 U.S. at 75-76. The U.S. Supreme Court's remand was based on its suspicion that the Florida Supreme Court arguably had impermissibly attributed its decision to an irrelevant source of law — that is, something other than the state legislature exercising its delegated Article II powers. Id. Here, the Michigan Court of Appeals neither ignored a statutory term, nor is there a hint that it was basing its decision on something other than the statute; it merely made an arguable interpretation of the statute before it. It cannot be said that the Michigan Court of Appeals "departed from the statutory meaning," Bush II, 531 U.S. at 115, or recognized a limitation on the legislature's Article II powers in the same way that the Florida Supreme Court may have attempted to do in Bush I.

Because there is no basis for this Court to ignore the Michigan court's ruling and make an independent judgment regarding what the Michigan Legislature intended by the term "aggrieved," Plaintiffs have not shown an entitlement to a recount under Michigan's statutory scheme.

Nor have Plaintiffs shown an entitlement to a recount that derives from a source other than the recount procedures established by the Michigan Legislature. It is true that presidential candidates and voters, once enfranchised by a state legislature, have a general right to have the vote counted fairly. See, e.g., Bush II at 104-105. But unlike Plaintiffs' first argument — which invokes the right to have a state's statutory election machinery applied as the legislature dictated, and may be made whenever the statute is violated — Plaintiff's second argument certainly requires facts amounting to an actual impact on the right to vote. There is no case law recognizing an independent federal right to a recount that either this Court or the parties have come across, in the absence of actual deprivation of voting rights. Rather, Plaintiffs' asserted right to a recount is just a restatement of her right to participate in a fair election, free from tampering or mistake. But, to date, Plaintiffs have not presented evidence of tampering or mistake. Instead, they present speculative claims going to the vulnerability of the voting machinery -- but not actual injury. Because mere potentiality does not amount to a claim that the vote was not fairly conducted, Plaintiffs' new claims are insufficient to maintain the existing TRO. No likelihood of success on that claim has been shown.

The issues that Plaintiffs raise are serious indeed. The vulnerability of our system of voting poses the threat of a potentially devastating attack on the integrity of our election system. But invoking a court's aid to remedy that problem in the manner Plaintiffs have chosen — seeking a recount as an audit of the election to test whether the vulnerability led to actual compromise of the voting system — has never been endorsed by any court, and would require, at a minimum, evidence of significant fraud or mistake — and not speculative fear of them. Such evidence has not been presented here.

For all these reasons, this Court dissolves the TRO effective immediately.

SO ORDERED.
